The thing is I am developing a simple app and in one of my view I am trying to animate a view by adding/removing classes from a view. So what I did is I have created a specific directive and then added the animation to the link function and controller. Here is the view: And then the directive: angular.module('app.directives', []).directive('loginView', function() { return { restrict: 'E', replace: true, template: "link: function(scope, elm, attrs) { scope.$watch('isInBackground', function(isInBackground) { // Animation Logic here... elm.removeClass('active');

}); } }; }); So, when the call the backend with all the data is processed and the response is returned to the controller, the API returns true for the isInBackground value, but the animation doesn't happen. In other words, when I log the elm.removeClass() inside the watch, it gives me true as well as the API, but the animation doesn't happen, or I am doing something wrong.

One of the best things about playing on Xbox Live is taking some online shots at other avid gamers on the Xbox Live servers. You can also take on a friend without joining a game. The online multiplayer is definitely more advanced than playing against players in the same room. While there's a lot of free-flowing nonsensical comedy that fits right in with the story of your life, the game is built with the story of the game in mind. To do this, the game did a lot of it's work with the help of a few different devices. NBA 2K13 has it's own customisable dashboard so that the game can interact with you without being tied into the console or XBLA.
